

Toronto: Lawyer and the City

Being a lawyer can be quite the rewarding career, but it is a career that can vary in degree and scope based on where you are located. Let's just say that being a lawyer is going to be a bit different in Toronto than being a lawyer in a small town with about 15,000 residents. There is a bit more responsibility involved and that responsibility has been increasing in recent years. Much of it has to do with the fact that people are no longer afraid to sue when something happens to them.

At one time, an individual could have pain inflicted on them by another person or even a company and they would let it roll off their back. That has changed drastically because people are tired of becoming victims and letting it slide. Lawyers in small cities have these cases as well, but lawyers in big cities have a larger potential customer base and they thrive on that. That is great because that means a better income, a better reputation, and leads to even more excitement.

Big city law adds mystery

Being a lawyer in the big city means the cases are going to be a bit more diverse. With more people come more unique situations in which a lawyer is needed. This gives the lawyer the opportunity to set a standard in law when a legitimate and unique case comes their way. The excitement alone is hard to contain and then there is that income and reputation factor. In small towns, the income ceiling is a bit lower because there is only so much to work with. If you are a small town with ten lawyers, then the earning potential is not as high. However, a lawyer in a large city such as Toronto has an incredibly higher earning potential.

Another aspect to being a lawyer in a large city that is unique is the reputation factor. It actually works differently in the big city than a small one. That is because the small city always knows what their big lawyers and doctors are doing. There is even a bit of jealousy amongst residents when driving past the home of one of these individuals. In the big city, there are more lawyers and many of the individuals could care less about their personal lives. This allows the lawyer to focus on their job as a lawyer without having to worry too much about privacy unless a high profile case is involved.

The competition factor

And then there is the competition factor that makes the profession even more exciting. Lawyers in small cities do have competition amongst each other, but lawyers in big cities have more lawyers to compete with and a larger playground to compete on. The sky is pretty much the limit in this area and that can make ad campaigns, signs, and other advertising media a lot of fun. As a lawyer in a big city, you have the money to do it so run with it. The only thing to lose is being one of the top lawyers, if not the top lawyer, in the city. Many big cities are now getting to the point where they offer awards and other types of recognition for lawyers who have done something exceptional, so you want that case that is going to get you that recognition. More recognition means you're going to get more clients. Most importantly, you're going to be upholding the law and being in a bigger city allows you an even larger opportunity to do just that. And that is why being a lawyer in a big city definitely has its perks.
